

My Darling Kerry

(Passed over July 11, 2004)

The Fourth of July is a day to celebrate true independence. The great country in which I lived and you live represents that freedom, that glory of pursuing a goal and reaching it. It is the ultimate expression of freedom and in the lesson, in the bloodshed, in the battle, you find the lesson. And today freedom is still being fought for all over the world and basically it's an individual fight, no matter what-a fight for an identity, a purpose, life itself. It's most important to free each individual spirit to live according to a loving energy.

Criticism and aggression are fine, as long as there is not threat to human life.

Freedom comes from the inner awareness. If we are tied to something that doesn't represent who and what we really are, we must get free. But the intention must be for true understanding, not for a gratification of the ego.

America is a great example of what can be, but it must not be jeopardized by pettiness or greed. And the lessons must be learned before there can be true peace. But we have every day, not just on the Fourth of July, to celebrate our spirit of life, of freedom, of independence, of standing for what we believe in, but not stepping on others' beliefs and ideas. As long as there is no threat to human life.

This is something that will come to the light in time so that each person can see the truth and then, as all come together, there will be such a force of love that it will elevate the earth to a new vibration.

You see, the worlds are not far apart, neither in the physical nor in the spiritual, because there is no true distance and there must not be any prefabricated distance among people. It is mere propaganda and must be stamped out. There must be oneness.

Independence, yes, but oneness always.

GOD BLESS AMERICA
